Đề 1: Some people believe that online learning is the future of education. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

As technology continues to advance, many people argue that online education will become the dominant form of learning in the future. While online education has its advantages, I believe it cannot fully replace traditional classroom learning.

First of all, online learning offers flexibility and cost savings, making learning more accessible than going to school in person every day. This is because students can study anywhere, anytime, thereby reducing costs associated with transportation, accommodation, or physical learning materials. For instance, working professionals can enroll in online night classes to upgrade their skills, instead of having to rush miles or take time off work to attend an in-person class. Therefore, the flexibility of online learning makes it a valuable educational tool, although it still has limitations.

Online learning often lacks interaction and practical experience, limiting student engagement and hands-on activities essential for deeper understanding. Many struggle with concentration, meanwhile subjects requiring direct practice, like medicine and engineering, cannot be fully taught online. For example, lab sessions and hands-on collaboration are essential to these fields but are difficult to achieve in an online environment.

In conclusion, while online learning provides flexibility and accessibility, it cannot fully replace traditional education due to its limitations in interaction. Therefore, I believe that a combination of online and traditional learning is the best approach to maximizing the future of educational effectiveness.

Đề 2: Some people believe that playing video games has a negative impact on children, while others believe that they can be educational and beneficial. Discuss both views and give your opinion.

Many argue that video games negatively affect children's development, while others believe they offer educational benefits and skill enhancement. This essay will discuss both perspectives before concluding that video games, when used in moderation, can be advantageous.

On the one hand, critics claim that video games contribute to various issues, including poor academic performance, reduced physical activity, and increased aggression. Excessive gaming can lead to addiction, causing children to neglect schoolwork and social interactions. Furthermore, violent video games may encourage aggressive behavior, as prolonged exposure to violent content can desensitize young minds. For instance, studies have shown that children who frequently play violent games may display more impulsive and hostile tendencies compared to their peers.

On the other hand, proponents argue that video games can enhance cognitive skills, problem-solving abilities, and even social interaction. Many educational games are designed to improve memory, critical thinking, and creativity. Additionally, multiplayer games encourage teamwork and communication, skills that are valuable in both academic and professional settings. For example, strategy-based games like "Minecraft" or "Civilization" require players to think critically and plan strategically, fostering logical reasoning and decision-making abilities.

In conclusion, while video games can have negative effects if misused, they also offer significant educational and cognitive benefits. Therefore, instead of banning them outright, parents and educators should guide children in using video games responsibly to maximize their positive impact.

Đề 3: The use of social media is replacing face-to-face interaction among many people in society. Do you think the advantages outweigh the disadvantages?

Social media has deeply infiltrated everyone's life and is believed to be replacing our face-to-face interaction. This situation, although advantageous in certain aspects, is generally a detriment to true human communication in the long run.

On the one hand, there are several benefits from using social networks to communicate. Firstly, they facilitate communication in modern times as now people can globally connect with old friends and relatives or with others who share common interests. For example, Facebook is currently providing service for 2.4 billion users who can choose to connect and interact with anyone they want, regardless of where they are. Secondly, study sessions are frequently happening on social networking websites through live streaming services. Therefore, learners around the world now can have free access to online classes on such sites.

On the other hand, the disadvantages of social media replacing face-to-face interaction are much more concerning. As these sites are becoming more and more dominant and attract large numbers of new users every day, people can fall prey to online communication abuse, such as online bullying and harassment. Social networking websites can become a toxic environment where users can be verbally assaulted because there are only a few rules, most of which are spoken rules rather than established guidelines, that restrict hateful or abusive content. Furthermore, overuse of social media to communicate can lead to people downplaying the importance of face-to-face interaction on which true human relationships thrive. Nowadays, many young and reclusive users prefer living in a virtual world on social sites to engaging in real-life relationships. This may have serious mental effects, such as increased stress, anxiety and loneliness.

In conclusion, the downsides of social media replacing face-to-face interaction are more significant than the benefits users could reap from those sites.

Đề 4: People living in large cities today face many problems in their everyday life. What are these problems? Should governments encourage people to move to smaller regional towns?

In recent years, there have been a number of everyday problems that people in big cities have to cope with. This essay will discuss two major problems, pollution and information overload, which I believe should lead governments to encourage people to move to regional areas.

These days, increased levels of pollution have been a great cause for concern among residents of big cities. Due to high volumes of traffic, large quantities of pollutants are being released into the atmosphere, causing the degradation of air quality, which is said to be a significant contributor to various types of respiratory diseases, such as lung cancer. Additionally, people in big cities are being bombarded with too much information from the media, including TV, social media, and advertising, with a large proportion of this information being fake or exaggerated. This can lead to confusion or, in some cases, social anarchy.

In my opinion, governments should do what they can to encourage city residents to move to regional areas. Firstly, it will reduce the number of vehicles in cities, which will reduce the levels of air pollution, which is hazardous to the health of citizens. Furthermore, fewer people living in big cities will relieve the pressure on the housing supply, where many people are forced to live in small, uncomfortable spaces. Studies have shown that people's living spaces have a direct impact on their mental health and how they perform at work.

In conclusion, severe air pollution and a bombardment of information are among the most serious problems facing city residents nowadays, and I feel that authorities should encourage people to relocate to other areas to live.

Đề 5: International travel is becoming cheaper, and countries are opening their doors to more and more tourists. Do the advantages of increased tourism outweigh the disadvantages?

Traveling abroad is becoming more affordable than ever before, and many nations are implementing new approaches to attract more tourists. Although there are still drawbacks of international travel, I think its values are more significant.

On the one hand, the downsides of welcoming foreign visitors are varied. First, the local environment can be adversely affected due to facility and infrastructural development. For example, in Vietnam, many tourism companies are permitted to chop down a great area of forests to construct modern commodities such as hotels and golf courses, exerting dire consequences on natural habitats. As for the countries that play host to international tourists, the rise in costs of living may lay much pressure on local people and be a detriment to domestic travel. This is because the growth in the number of tourists from abroad would encourage the costs of hotel rooms and other services to increase. People in the neighborhood and domestic visitors would suffer in comparison.

On the other hand, I suppose the benefits of international travel would eclipse those analyzed disadvantages. First, the regional economy can enormously benefit from the burgeoning tourism industry as more occupations will be created to accommodate the needs of tourists. Local people can have more job opportunities in hotels or restaurants and therefore earn more money to improve their living standards. Second, the increased number of foreign people coming to visit another country would enhance tourism industries, contributing greatly to the wealth of that country. If tourists enjoy their trips, they will recommend the destination to their friends or perhaps they will come back in the future.

In conclusion, it appears to me that the merits of international tourism are more notable than its drawbacks.

Đề 6: Many people prioritize salary when choosing a career. Do you agree that financial compensation is the most important factor, or are there other aspects that hold equal weight?

The financial rewards of a job are undeniably important, but when it comes to choosing a career path, salary shouldn't be the sole deciding factor. While financial security is essential to meet basic needs and maintain a comfortable lifestyle, other aspects contribute significantly to overall job satisfaction and personal fulfillment.

There's no denying the importance of salary. We all need income to cover necessities like housing, food, and healthcare. Without a sufficient salary, it can be difficult to achieve a decent standard of living. This is particularly true for those with dependents. For example, artists often pursue their passion despite lower incomes, which can make supporting a family challenging.

However, focusing solely on salary can lead to career dissatisfaction. A positive work environment, with supportive colleagues and a good manager, can significantly impact happiness and well-being. Furthermore, a sense of achievement and professional growth provides intrinsic rewards that go beyond financial compensation. Mastering new skills, taking on challenging projects, and climbing the career ladder can be highly motivating factors. Additionally, some individuals find purpose in careers that allow them to contribute to society, regardless of the salary.

In conclusion, while financial stability plays a crucial role, it shouldn't be the sole motivator when choosing a career. A fulfilling work environment, professional development opportunities, and the ability to make a positive impact all contribute to long-term satisfaction and a rewarding career path.

Đề 7: Cosmetic surgery for purely aesthetic reasons is a growing trend. Should these procedures be banned, or are there situations where they are justified?

The rise of cosmetic surgery raises a complex question: should such procedures be entirely prohibited, or are there circumstances where they are acceptable? While fostering self-acceptance and prioritizing essential medical care hold merit, a blanket ban on cosmetic surgery overlooks the potential benefits for certain individuals.

One compelling argument against cosmetic surgery stems from the pressure to conform to unrealistic beauty standards. Media portrayals are often heavily edited, creating a skewed perception of attractiveness. This can lead to low self-esteem, particularly among young people who aspire to resemble celebrities they see on screen. Encouraging self-confidence and promoting inner beauty should be a priority.

Furthermore, cosmetic procedures can strain healthcare resources. These surgeries, even if performed privately, require the expertise of medical professionals who might otherwise be available for critical procedures within the public healthcare system. This can lead to longer wait times for essential surgeries, such as hip replacements. There are situations where cosmetic surgery can significantly improve a person's life. Individuals with severe burns or disfigurements can benefit greatly from reconstructive surgery. Regaining a sense of normalcy and improved self-image can have a profound impact on their overall well-being.

To conclude, while societal pressures and resource allocation are valid concerns, a complete ban on cosmetic surgery wouldn't address the root causes of insecurity. Instead, promoting self-acceptance and ensuring access to essential healthcare are crucial. However, for individuals with severe disfigurements, cosmetic surgery can be a life-changing tool for regaining confidence and leading a fulfilling life.

Đề 8: Teenagers' increasing screen time online is often blamed for a decline in their social skills. Do you agree with this concern, or are there other factors at play?

The rise of the internet in teenagers' lives has sparked concerns about its impact on their social skills. While excessive screen time devoted to passive activities can be detrimental, the internet's potential for social interaction shouldn't be overlooked. This essay argues that a nuanced perspective is needed, acknowledging both potential drawbacks and unexpected benefits.

Firstly, concerns about the internet's impact on social skills are valid. Teenagers spending hours on solitary online games or passive video consumption might experience a decline in face-to-face communication skills. This lack of practice in reading body language, interpreting nonverbal cues, and navigating real-time conversations can lead to social awkwardness or reduced empathy. Additionally, relying on online validation through likes and comments might lead to a distorted sense of self-worth and difficulty forming genuine connections in the real world.

However, dismissing the internet as purely anti-social is a missed opportunity. Social media platforms, when utilized thoughtfully, can provide valuable tools for facilitating social interaction. Online communities and forums can connect teenagers with like-minded individuals, fostering friendships that might not have been possible otherwise. Furthermore, online platforms can be used to organize social events and nurture existing friendships through messaging and communication.

To conclude, while concerns regarding excessive screen time are justified, the Internet itself may not be solely responsible for a decline in social skills. The key lies in striking a balance. Parents and educators should encourage teenagers to utilize the internet's social potential while maintaining healthy boundaries. This can involve setting time limits for online activities, promoting engaging offline activities, and encouraging participation in clubs or sports that promote face-to-face interactions.

Đề 9: Many celebrities achieve fame based on wealth and lifestyle rather than talent or achievements. Do you agree that this trend sets a negative example for young people?

The rise of celebrity culture has sparked a debate about its impact on young people. While some celebrities gain fame solely for their extravagant lifestyles and wealth, others serve as positive role models due to their accomplishments. This essay argues that the influence of celebrities is multifaceted, with both positive and negative aspects that warrant consideration.

On the negative side, a growing number of celebrities achieve fame through means unrelated to talent or merit. This can include inheritance, marriage into wealth, or participation in reality TV shows. These individuals often flaunt their luxurious lifestyles, prioritizing appearance and superficiality over hard work and genuine achievement. A prime example is Paris Hilton, who rose to fame through wealth and media attention rather than demonstrable skills. This can send a detrimental message to young people, potentially leading them to believe that success doesn't require dedication and education.

However, dismissing all celebrities as negative influences would be a mistake. Many serve as positive role models due to their remarkable achievements. Actors, musicians, and athletes gain fame through years of dedication and honing their skills. They demonstrate resilience, perseverance, and ambition – traits crucial for success in any field. Jackie Chan, the renowned actor and martial artist, exemplifies this type of positive role model. His journey to fame showcases the power of hard work and dedication, inspiring young people to cultivate their talents.

To sum up, the influence of celebrities on young people is complex. While some celebrities represent a negative trend of fame based on superficiality, others embody positive values of hard work and accomplishment. Young people need to develop critical thinking skills to differentiate between these two extremes. By promoting and recognizing celebrities who showcase the value of hard work and dedication, we can navigate the influence of celebrity culture to inspire and motivate young people.

Đề 10: A few languages are increasingly spoken in different countries, while the usage of others is rapidly declining. Is this a positive or a negative development?

Today, only a few languages reign supreme in most countries, whilst the usage of many other languages has declined. I argue in this essay why I believe this is an unwanted trend, for although it could help stimulate economic growth, the long-term consequences of cultural erosion are comparatively more undesirable.

On the one hand, it could be said that as a result of globalization, more people are learning the languages of world-leading economies, which leads to a greater overall increase in global GDP. At the moment, being bilingual boosts employment opportunities drastically for prospective employees since they can bridge the gap between two different cultures and economies. For instance, English and Chinese are the languages of choice today, and fluency is a skill sought after by international employers as they hope to do business in both English and Chinese-speaking countries.

However, language is the foundation of culture, and if people cannot communicate, they cannot form a collective identity: the result would be that the culture gets eroded over time. Going into more detail, some words in many languages cannot be translated to others precisely because they are specific to a cultural context; the decline of a language would also mean the decline of a culture. Using a more specific example, the Welsh language is barely spoken because the English sought to replace their culture following an invasion; thus, learning Welsh has been considered an important way to preserve culture for many young Welsh people.

In conclusion, although the use of only a few languages over many can lead to more economic development, it is still nonetheless more important that people preserve their individual cultures; thus the aforementioned trend has been an unwanted one.
